To our valued customers:

In recent weeks Axiom has become aware of a number of rumors being circulated and we are well aware of their origin. Our normal response to this kind of activity is to ignore it and to remain focused on you, our valued customer. However in an effort to quell these activities, this letter is being distributed to address some of the issues. It is our hope that this letter will answer any questions you may have by presenting the facts, as we believe them to be. In the future, please do not hesitate to contact Axiom directly with your concerns.

The Patent Issue

Axiom Worldwide is committed to being the leader in its field. We have promised our valued customers that our products will utilize the most advanced technology that is currently available. To assure this, Axiom has gone to great lengths to establish relationships with innovative technology suppliers that share our vision. The result is that only components that meet our stringent quality standards are incorporated into any Axiom product. Axiom is also committed to protecting its intellectual property for the benefit of its customers. This includes trademarks and patents. An example of this commitment is found in Axiom's DRX 9000™. Incorporated into the design of the DRX9000 are more than 30 critical components that are protected by existing patents or patent applications. Axiom's exclusive partnership agreements with its suppliers have allowed Axiom to pass this security and protection along to its customers. No other spinal decompression device can utilize these specific component parts. Furthermore, in December 2004, Axiom applied for a patent on its DRX 9000 and the method and process of delivering True Spinal Decompression™ therapy. In June 2006, the United States Patent Office published Axiom's proposed patent. It is a lengthy process to be awarded a patent and to date, Axiom's patent application for the DRX 9000 remains pending. A copy of the proposed Axiom patent can be accessed on the Web at: <http://www.uspto.gov/patft/>.
